

Testimonials

Dear Beth,

I have done hundreds of interviews over the last 30 years as a pioneer in women's studies, an author, lecturer, university faculty member and public humanities scholar. From Morning Edition's Susan Stanberg on NPR and Amy Goodman on Democracy Now to Jenny Murray and "The Woman's Hour" hosted by BBC Radio, I've worked with gifted and skilled journalists. Never have I felt the rapport I've experienced with you.

You set up a solid personal connection before the interview and create a context within which a creative and spontaneous interview can happen. Beyond active listening, you draw out the deeper truths of the interviewee. I found myself making new connections in the course of our interview.

Thank you for having me on your show.

Warm greetings,

Sally

My interview with Beth was an exhilarating experience. She was knowledgeable, well-prepared and asked questions that demonstrated her interest and enthusiasm for the topic. I appreciate her obvious commitment to approaching her work with integrity and to sharing cutting edge information and ideas with her listeners.

Beth has a talent for adding insight and 'understandability' to the unique specialties of her guests. My own work in Unmasking the Gender Effect is often formulated in words to reach the corporate business crowd. Beth is a true partner in adding illumination to my points to bring it down to earth and make a bigger difference for her broad audience.

I thoroughly enjoyed talking with Beth on Quantum Leaps because unlike other radio hosts, she talks about important issues that affect people's lives. Not many would devote an entire show to discussing the status of children's well-being in our country, but Beth Wilson did just that.

Beth Wilson can be summed up in one word, versatile. One week she interviews an Apollo 14 astronaut and the next a producer from Hollywood. Beth sees in 360 degrees and her thinking is always cutting new ground for her listeners—often speaking what is in their hearts and minds. Beth is straight up, speaks common sense and that is why people are listening!
